International students learn culture

It is indeed good news that there are more international students attending U.S. universities and that there are more American students going abroad to pursue academic study. Such programs and exchanges promote better understanding among governments and cultures, and there is little doubt that employers value more than ever experience abroad on a graduate's resume. That is why we must not only keep track of the number of students both going abroad and coming here; we must also monitor and improve the programs themselves. Too many U.S. programs, for example, feature American students going abroad, studying and staying in large, homogeneous groups. We need to increase programs that offer each student the opportunity to be fully immersed in another culture through class work, research, and service programs which are intercultural in design and implementation. More good news--this is beginning to happen.
