"When Opium Can Be Benign": The Economist on religion in the PRC :: Jottings from the Granite Studio

This article was aggregated from Jottings from the Granite StudioThe Economist (via CDT) had a fascinating piece last week on religion in the PRC: a subject that has been on my mind since a visit I made last month to the Tianhou Gong here in Tianjin. At the temple, I was struck by the number of people worshipping and praying on a cold, gray North China morning. According to the Economist, what I saw was only the tip of the iceberg.

The article opens in Hongliutan village where a local notable, 64-year old Wang Kehua, rebuilt the "Black Dragon Temple" back in the 1980s. The temple has since provided funds for a school and an irrigation system. Two things strike me about this temple. The first is the way Wang appealed to the villagers sense of divine retribution. You see, the Black Dragon Temple had been sacked during the Cultural Revolution but, proclaimed Wang, look what happened to the defilers: one was crushed by a donkey cart, one bled to death from an axe wound...one by one they all perished. The second thing is the way the temple has restructured village society. Mr. Wang is the head of the village, by his election as village chief, his position as head of the village clan, and because he controls the purse strings for the temple. The village party cadre is only 32 and local residents disparagingly refer to him as "the lad." Usually the party cadre calls the shots, not so here. And Hongliutan is by no means an isolated case.

Evidence of China's religious revival can be seen throughout the countryside in the form of lavish new temples, halls for ancestor worship, churches and mosques (except in the far western province of Xinjiang, where the government worries that Islam is intertwined with ethnic separatism and keeps tighter rein). Officially there are more than 100m religious believers in China, or about 10% of the population. But experts say the real number is very much higher.

This does not mean that China has embraced religious freedom. Some religions" Tibetan Buddhism, Islam as practised in Xinjiang, Catholicism and "house church" Protestantism, which involves informal gatherings of believers outside registered churches"are still subject to tight controls because of the party's fears that their followers might have an anti-government bent. A seven-year-old crackdown on Falun Gong, a quasi-Buddhist sect that flourished in the 1990s, is still being pursued with ruthless intensity. Many Falun Gong practitioners, as well as lesser numbers of followers of other faiths who refuse to accept state attempts to regulate their religions, are imprisoned in labour camps.

Within the party, however, debate is growing about whether it should take a different approach to religion. This does not mean being more liberal towards what it regards as anti-government activities. But it could mean toning down the party's atheist rhetoric and showing stronger support for faiths that have deep historical roots among the ethnic Han majority. The party is acutely aware that its own ideology holds little attraction for most ordinary people. Given that many are drawn to other beliefs, it might do better to try to win over public opinion by actively supporting these beliefs rather than grudgingly tolerating them or cracking down.

One other point worth highlighting. The article describes the growth of Christianity in rural societies. Part of my research is on why Christianity was so reviled in the 19th century in China and so I am watching its spread in the 21st century with considerable interest. One theory suggested by the Economist article is the interest of women in this 'foreign' religion:

Ironically, the growth of clan power has helped to fuel the growth of Christianity in some parts of the countryside. In a village in the eastern province of Shandong, the wife of a former party secretary was a Protestant who attended prayer meetings with her female friends. Their religious enthusiasm was apparently fuelled by the subordinate role of women in the clan. A married woman is expected to revere only her husband's ancestors but is excluded from his clan hierarchy. The fast growing house-church communities often disapprove of ancestor worship, thus attracting women who feel fettered by clan strictures.

I think there are a variety of motives behind the recent resurgence in religion, not the least of which is the government relaxing its controls on (some) religious practices. As I mentioned in my previous post, there is a trend in China's history that in periods of economic growth/dislocation and increased social mobility (both up and down) interest in religion grows. We saw this with growth (and subsequent proscription) of Buddhism in the Tang, the Song Confucian revival as well as at the end of the Ming and Qing dynasties. Sometimes this interest--as in the case of the late Qing--can lead to rebellion and chaos. In fact in almost all of the major rebellions of the 18th and 19th centuries religion was a factor: White Lotus, the 8 Trigrams, the Taipings, the Nian, the Hui, the Boxers, to name only some of the more notable examples. This is what the CCP fears most about religion. I think it's a long leap from Granny Wu lighting incense to Mazu at the local temple to Hong Xiuquan sacking Nanjing and establishing a quasi-Christian kingdom based on shared wealth and celibacy (for his followers, not for Hong.) But the pattern is there and the resurgence of religion in today's PRC is something worth watching carefully. The following articles might be of interest to you, too : Tianjin Taihou Palace and religious practice in the PRC Chinese Churches Face Challenges of Growth Elton John: Religion promotes hatred Intercultural Religion Mis-interpretation Try a little tolerance
