The Weather Takes a Shart

I ran a very long way last night to try to escape the doom from above. It fell in sheets, rocks, hamsters, and/or pirate ships. There was nothing I could do to escape. Either that or it just snowed a lot, and by a lot I mean a metric lot. Strange things, well stranger than usual, have happened to my brain after being stuck in my apartment for 36 straight hours, like when the assorted chicken parts in my fridge didnâ€™t move at all, and several bottles of beer emptied themselves straight into my mouth. Crazy, I know. Now for something completely different: Bicycle Racing.

I know a guy who knows a guy who met a guy once who won 50 bucks and a rear fender from a â€ˆ68 chevy by beating him in a 500 mile bicycle race. They really wanted to go from the north pole to the south pole but with the ice caps melting and the polar bears getting hungry they only made it about 100 miles off the north pole before the loser fell into the water and was eaten simultaneously by bears, seals, and a shark. Animals waste nothing in their quest for nutrition, even the bike was consumed on the way down by the giant polar land seahorses. The winner made it another 50 miles before, inexplicably, was beaten to death by penguins who were simply asking for directions. Oh those wacky translation mistakes! They never found his body (bears got there first, AGAIN) so they buried the bumper and the 50 bucks. The moral of this story? Car bumpers are not media of exchange.

Laknoth of Nepal

Last week a Daily News Record article highlighted a great man from Nepal working on translating and editing a series of Old Testament commentaries here in Harrisonburg, Virginia (http://nl.newsbank.com/nl-search/we/Archives?p\_action=print)

I had the privilege of taking Laknoth to our small group and then meeting him for lunch the following day. We are like-minded in many ways - principally in is desire to equip, train and reach his people using different mediums - like film/video. He has invited me to help him make some productions in Nepal. He claims that were a contextualized video such as â€œThe Good Samaritanâ€• to be produced, he could get the production on national T.V. (in a country of 27 Million people). What a tremendous opportunity and a lot to chew on! Apart from the airfare, Laknoth claims that such a production could be done for $3,000! Amazing! Below is a copy of the article.

Bible Translation Writerâ€™s â€œCallingâ€™

Author(s): TOM MITCHELL, Daily News-Record Date: February 19, 2007 Section: Front Page

HARRISONBURG - In the past year, Laknoth Manaen has seen lots of change in Nepal, and over the next few months he hopes to bring more. Manaen, a freelance writer who turns 60 on Feb. 28, feels driven to steer his nationâ€™s newly liberated people toward God. The timing, he says, has never been better.

â€œThere is a whole new environment in Nepal,â€• said Manaen, referring to last yearâ€™s coup that toppled the Asian nation's centuries-old monarchy. "I feel a calling."

His means of further nudging his nation to a brighter future, says Manaen, involves a project meant to make reading Scripture easier: the translation of the Bible's Old Testament books from English into the language of Nepali. Manaen's job is part of a broader plan to bring Scripture to interested eyes. With the help of Harrisonburg-based Manna Publications, which globally spreads Christian literature, Manaen has spent the last month in the city proofreading the final draft of his translation, which Manna is publishing the text.

While changing the Bible from one tongue to another is no snap, given Nepal's broad illiteracy, Manaen feels that Manna's simpler English wording lessens the task. Manaen translated the Old Testament to Nepali using Manna's English version.

"For many years, Fred's publication has put out easy to read English, and that caught my eye," said Manaen, alluding to Manna author-publisher Fred Morris of Harrisonburg.

"In Nepal, most people in rural areas need lots of books that are easy to read. Most all who want to understand the Bible buy it, if they can read it or not."

For years, more than ignorance blocked Nepal's path to Christianity, said Manaen. The Asian country's prominent Hindu faith trumped other religions.

"Back in the 1950s, there were hardly any Christians in Nepal," said Manaen. "Today, there are more than 600,000."

Manaen, who is married with two daughters, was born in northeastern India, a grandson of his family's first Christian. Manaen's father, like many Christians in India before 1990, was harassed for his faith. Other Christians, said Manaen, were jailed. In the early 1990s, lawmakers in Nepal relaxed religious controls, opting not to enforce anti-Christian laws still on the books.

Buoyed by change, Manaen believes that Nepalese will embrace the Bible, particularly as the country sheds what Manaen sees as Hinduism's socially oppressive ways. Nepal is ripe for a faith that preaches peace, especially after enduring an 11-year civil war that, according to Manaen, finally ended last spring after claiming 13,000 lives.

"I base my optimism on what I observe," said Manaen. "New thoughts, new ideas are coming out. There is hope that Christianity will have a big presence there in the future."

Those close to Manaen agree that his translations will touch lives.

"There are Nepalese all over the world," said Morris, the publisher. "They'll be wanting this translation when he's finished."

Word of the Day

Processology

As used by the Prime Minister's Official Spokesman (PMOS) today "

Asked for further information about any act of commemoration at Croke Park next weekend, the PMOS replied that clearly, the first match at Croke Park had been special in its own right. The second match, because of the teams involved, had also a significance around it. However, first and foremost, this was a game of rugby, and that was how both the IRFU and the GAA wanted to treat it, and that was entirely how it should be. What was entirely proper was that there should have been discussions about how we should handle it, but a consensus had been reached, and we fully supported that consensus. The PMOS said that he was not going to get into processology about the discussions, but they were normal discussions that took place around any event such as this one, and they were nothing out of the ordinary.

Lunch Discussions #781: 'and the Aliens Version Was Funnier.'

John: Caught any of the clips from the Fox Daily Show ripoff, The 1/2 Hour News Hour? Tyrone: 'you are kidding me. No. How is it? John: Please. Watch.

John: It's as if aliens tried to decipher humor from radiated cable television waves and then constructed a comedy show with a poor translation algorithm. It is un-joke. You could put it in a chamber with a knock-knock joke and use the resultant explosion to power a starship. Tyrone: That Rush bit " it starts as the standard 'My fellow Americans' bit, then Coulter comes in, then there are phone calls 'it's as if they don't know how sketches work. John: I love how it opens with Rush slamming Howard Dean as too crazy to run in 2008. Which is literally a four year old joke used against a guy who absolutely will not be running for President a year in the future. Not only did they launch the show with a hack joke, they launched it with a hack joke that doesn't even make sense. Tyrone: That beat the Marion Barry joke, which is fifteen years old. There are premises, plenty of joke premises, or even joke structures that don't land on the best punchline 'John: I'm not sure they've employed any actual television comedy writers. They spent two full minutes on a 'B.O.' joke about Barack Obama. That's the A-game for the opening show. The sort of name-joke that the jocks stick on a kid in freshman year, then guffaw and punch each other every time they say it. So I guess that's what the show's message is: 'If you're the type of schoolyard bully who would call a kid 'B.O.' and think that is HI-LARIOUS, you're our target audience.' Tyrone: Such people are out there, John. And they vote. Who's running this thing? John: Joel Surnow. Tyrone: 'wait. The 24 guy? John: Yep. Tyrone: Has he ever worked in comedy before? John: Nope. Tyrone: Would you put Dick Wolf in charge of a comedy show? On what planet did that make sense? John: I've become fascinated by Surnow's narrative. Did you read the New Yorker article on him? It mentions how his rightward political turn was influenced by his friend Cyrus Nowrasteh, the guy who wrote the very bad and relentlessly incorrect Path to 9/11 mini-series. Tyrone: Didn't you actually defend Nowrasteh? John: I was more making the point that an agenda-driven piece of writing almost always fails. But I certainly held no grudge. The odd thing is, all the recent media mentions of Nowrasteh drop the fact, like a little biographical tidbit, that he's the son of a deposed advisor to the Shah of Iran. And no one seems to mention that this is Very. Fucked. Up. We have been living with the Ayatollahs as the bad guys so long, we've forgotten that the Shah was not the good guy. His secret police, Savak, carried out thousands of tortures and assassinations. This is like being the son of a Pinochet advisor. This is like being the son of a Saddam Hussein advisor. I personally would not throw this on my CV. Tyrone: Maybe his dad was a dissenting voice. Maybe he was the anti-torture advisor. John: Of course. The Shah, like all autocratic dictators, hated "eyes-men." He liked to mix it up in the council chambers. Get a free exchange of ideas going. Tyrone: Like House. "All of you, give me your opinions. Now shut up and do what I say." John: "I yes. The Shah of Iran was the House of the Middle East." Tyrone: Or is House the Shah of medicine? Hmmm? John: At the very least, I'd like to see Fox promote the show with that logline.

At this point we drifted to other topics. But if I may, there's another interesting Surnow quote about his new comedy show:

"Almost every comedy show or satire show I see uses the same talking points against George W. Bush and Dick Cheney," Surnow tells Variety. "The other side hasn't been skewered in a fair and balanced way."

That's just fascinating. If that's true, he hasn't been watching The Daily Show, which mocked the ineffectiveness of the Democratic candidates in 2004, and is now hitting the new Democratic candidates with equal aplomb. He also hasn't seen every other late-night comedy show. (My favorite joke of the cycle goes to Amy Poehler: "Earlier today, Senator Barack Obama announced his candidacy for president. Upon hearing the news, Hillary Clinton punched a pillow so hard it turned into a diamond.") I hate to keep explaining this, but if it seems like the Republicans have been suffering the comedic brunt for the last six years, this is because they have been in power, and comedy's job is to kick power in the junk. More revealing is the idea of using "talking points" in a comedy show. This is obviously someone who's never worked a real comedy writer's room. For topical runs, you start with "okay, what happened today," and you look at everything. Everything. This is because comedy has maybe a 10% success rate on the pitch, and that's just for joke-like objects, never mind actual functioning funny jokes. To fill a show with a couple dozen funny jokes, you don't have the time or luxury to stick to talking points. You need to find the funny. Unless you're not worrying about funny " in which case, you get the 1/2 Hour News Hour.

On a deeper level, this is about how you cannot make humor, you find humor. And you find humor in truth. As Tyrone pointed out to me later in the conversation, often Stewart does nothing but play the tape of a politician's actual words, and then do a reaction. A joke only works " although every comic has a theory on this " if there's some underlying bit of truth to it. Either truth unrecognized before now, eliciting surprised laughter in response, or recognized and appreciated, the so-called "sympathy laugh." (see Simpson, Homer: "It's funny because it's true!" which in context is damn near a three-level meta-joke.) This is why jokes about Bush not being bright work " because we've all heard him speak, and he does not come across as a bright man. This is why jokes about Bill Clinton being a horndog work " because Billy-boy's a horndog. You could not do a joke about Bush being, say, an adulterer, even if that were your "talking point." It just wouldn't work, because it doesn't ring true.

This, by the way, is the underpinning of the situation comedy, or nearly all scripted comedy: an ordinary person is put in a ridiculous situation, and his truthful response is amusing; or a ridiculous person is put in an ordinary situation and his truthful response is amusing.

Comedy is truth, truth is reality, and if "Reality has a well-known liberal bias" for now, anyway, you just have to suck that up if your job is the funny. One party has boring, earnest junior Senators with competing health plans running for President. The other party has the guy in charge of fighting child pornography online soliciting minors online, a Senator who talked about "man on dog" action, a State Representative who doesn't believe the Earth revolves around the Sun, and a Vice-President who won on an anti-gay platform with a gay daughter who's pregnant with another woman's child, which may be why he shot a dude in the face. Nobody's fault Fate dealt one player the "goofy" cards for the last few hands. Don't worry, soon the Democrats will be completely back in power, the scales will tip back, and we can go back to mocking universal health care and adultery.

There's a further point to be made about the general level of emotional retardation among Hollywood writers and executives (both liberal and conservative), combined with a stunning level of ignorance of history and politics, but hey, I need to work in this town. Content from: Kung Fu Monkey

blogging & rss information

now that you have got a basic understanding of the ins and outs of blogs, and some options available, you're probably wondering: how does this help my business? how does it help me to stand out?

1. team communication. companies use blogs internally to communicate project status to stakeholders and managers. it beats clogging everybody's email with mass broadcasts. it allows these missives to be archived, indexed and easily searched.
2. enrich your clients. you can easily link to articles and resources relevant to your readers and their needs. you can more easily attract experts to provide value-added content to your audience.
3. get to know your customer. nobody buys from someone they don't know. blogging allows you to demonstrate your expertise and point-of-view quickly and easily. in addition, blogs allow the customers to receive your updates in the format they choose.
4. collaborate. you can create your own marketing buzz to drive attention and buyers to your products and services. some companies use internal blogs to report on projects or to track work groups distributed around the world.
5. research and development. weblogs are the perfect forum to test out new ideas and receive instant feedback. you can allow others to see how you develop your products and services, and at the same time, they can tell you how best to serve them.
6. go global. blogs, like other online media, allow you to take your business and ideas to a global market. translation services are getting better every day, allowing more people to read online content in different languages. i've helped bloggers from new york to new zealand, from indiana to india.
7. hidden entrance to the press. journalists are busier than ever and blogs provide a virtual directory of pundits on any topic. you and your company can be the content expert they're looking for. furthermore, if your company is talked about in the blogosphere it could end up using that exposure as a back door to the press.
8. get published. publishers are turning to blogs to find new writing talent. blogs can give a publisher a taste of your writing style as well as a sample of your depth of knowledge. content specific blogs show a commitment to a certain topic or subject matter.
9. write your book. let your readers help you write your latest book or article. post chapters or ideas, then let readers help you in researching, testing and suggesting ideas. or, use a blog after your book is published to update the material or to answer questions from readers.
10. success stories. invite clients to blog about their successes with your products and services - it's like a living testimonial that never ends. as clients share their experiences, your prospects can see first-hand how you can help them, too.

Design Offices: Open Plan or Private Space?

As an Internet professional (translation: geek), I know that I prefer a quiet space where I can contemplate, write, analyze, and research. For the last 3.5 years, I have been in an open work environment: no walls, limited meeting rooms, and no quiet space.

Working from home is also hard, as one of my kids is only in school half-day, and I don't have my own office.

My problem is that I am an introvert. That has been seen in a negative light for a very long time, but it is who I am. I don't like wide-open spaces, and they actually sap me of my energy and my ability to feel on top of my game.

For me, the picture of the stereotypical picture of the design / architecture office as an open, unstructured space, allowing for collaboration and collectivity when creating, concerns me. Is this a stereotype spread by the media and artsy design magazines, or is the reality different?

As a person who is trying to liberate myself from the shackles of the technology masters to follow the path of creativity, I am concerned that if I eventually begin working for a creative firm, will my creativity be destroyed by the need to work in an open-plan office? Or do design firms recognize that not everyone benefits from the open plan office?

Technorati tags: open plan, no privacy, quiet, office, work, environment, introvert, design, creatives

Intranews - Daily News Site for Linguists

India's DNA to launch on-line translation facility

New Delhi, India (DNA): Internet users will soon be able to utilise the virtual world to overcome their linguistic limitations with the Department of Information Technology planning a Web-based translation facility next year. The facility, to be launched in October 2008, would not only help people to translate from English to regional languages, but also edit scanned or handwritten documents on tablet personal computers.

How to make quick content changes when translating into other languages

New York, USA (WebProNews): How can you make quick content changes when you have to translate into other languages? For global companies, translating their content into other languages can be a time-consuming process that delays the launch of new pages and campaigns. So, exactly how do you speed up your ability to change content when you have to do all that translating at the end?

The American Dream

Camp Taqaddum, Iraq (Stars & Stripes): He's got the strut, the confident Devil Dog swagger. He peppers his speech with "awesome" (and more than occasionally drops the F-bomb). He's definitely gung-ho. After three years of working with the U.S.-led coalition, Sam, an Iraqi translator for the 9th Engineer Support Battalion, has adopted the mannerisms of a typical young Marine. Now, he wants to be one.

European Commission recommends companies use more interpreters and translators

Brussels, Belgium (M&C): A new commission study says that 11 per cent of Europe's small and medium-sized companies each lose at least some 325,000 euros (426,000 dollars) over a three-year period owing to communication barriers. Citing a 'clear linkage between languages and export success,' the report said that small businesses have a large potential to increase their total exports if they hire more native speakers, recruit multilingual staff and use translators and interpreters.

New Zealand and Canada treat aboriginal claims differently

Victoria, Canada (Canada): It's not just a vast distance that separates Canada and New Zealand, but also a vast difference in how the two countries have tackled the contentious issue of aboriginal treaty claims. While Canadian treaties prod slowly through complex legal territory, New Zealand continues to push forward a billion-dollar settlement plan with its indigenous Maori people, ensuring everything from land rights to language preservation.
